• The Impact of Response Time on Deceptive Communication (with Bohan Ye)

The inclusion of response time indicators has become a common feature in the contemporary landscape of social media sites. What private information does the response time carry when there is a conflict of interest, and do people use it to improve their welfare? We portray a model and design a modified cheap talk game to study the intricate interplay between response time, private information, and its influence on users' well-being, tailored to situations where truth discovery is time consuming. Our investigation uncovers a noteworthy sender hope to not have to lie to get what she wants. Given this preference, the private information reveals the consideration process, instead of the mechanical discovery process. We find that when there is an apparent conflict of interest, the longer the response time, the less credible the message. However, receivers are unable to extract substantial welfare gains through the response time. Furthermore, when senders are aware of the availability of their response time, they are able to manipulate it.

Publication

• Fortune and Identity (with Gary Charness), Economics Letters, 222(110954):1-3, 2023.

While group identity can generate in-group bias, the topic of how activities generate group affiliation is largely unexplored. We experimentally study the effect of shared experience on group affiliation, varying shared experiences by paying subjects differently for the same task. The results show that shared fortune leads to in-group bias, while shared misfortune does not.
